In the 1940's, Russian researchers did a sleep experiment on five people. The experiment involved keeping the five people awake in a chamber for as long as possible to see what the effect of sleeplessness has on the body. After fifteen days the experiment was terminated and the researchers were met with utter horror and even death when they opened the chamber. Sleeplessness is terrible for your body and especially for your mind. First your alertness gets affected then your concentration and eventually you go completely bonkers and suspicious of anyone and everyone. Depression, anxiety and physical body aches also goes hand in hand with sleeplessness. It is important for you to improve your quality sleep so you can focus better, be healthier and happier. Since that scare, New Zealand's Prime Minister deployed military personnel to enforce proper quarantine processes for travelers. While the country did close its borders for a time, it reopened them to citizens with a strict hotel quarantine procedure in place. That is, travelers are required to show a negative COVID-19 test before their departure and, upon their arrival, must undergo a two-week quarantine process. 2. Find a niche in the market via storytelling and specialization. It's tempting to daydream about what it would be like if you had no competition at all. When you build a niche, you come much closer to achieving this ultimate goal. That's because a crowded marketing has far less room for expansion. To compete in a crowded market, you need a unique selling proposition. The more unique it is, the less room for competition there is. Storytelling is a great way to build your niche by creatively crafting stories around your products. Through the use of stories, you can become a part of your prospect's lifestyle and not remain a stand-alone product or service. Burst offers free stock photography that you can use for creating and promoting stories about your brand across social media. Specialization leads to a scalable and successful business. A niche market is reliable, and the prospects are easier to target. Moreover, the customer retention rate is good. Start targeting locally relevant platforms where your target customers are, and adopt a niche marketing strategy for them. We've covered how to create a marketing plan, and have included examples to apply to your own business. Similar to identifying and solving pain points, developing a niche via storytelling and specialization can be a long-term effort. Take several weeks to devise your story and then regularly turn this story into content such as blog posts and email marketing campaigns. Specialization can also be a long-term process, as it can involve gradually scaling back products and services that no longer fit into your niche. Sound quality - Sound quality is the most important factor when buying headphones. As a rule of thumb, you'll want to check the driver size—the larger the driver, the louder the sound it's capable of producing. Average earphone drivers will measure between 8mm and 15mm, while headphone drivers are a bit bigger, between 20mm and 50mm. If possible, listen to a few songs with the headphones before making your purchase because different headphones deliver different sound profiles.
